W&M law school sets conference on veterans

The College of William and Mary’s law school will host a national conference in Washington on ways to help veterans obtain the benefits they’ve earned.

The two-day “Law Clinics Serving Veterans” conference beginning today is expected to draw about 140 participants, including representatives from more than 40 law schools and universities.

In August, W&M’s Puller Clinic became the first law school clinic to be invited to join the Department of Veterans Affairs’ Fully Developed Claims Community of Practice.

Puller Clinic directors and staff will share best practices with schools that plan similar initiatives.

Since the Puller Clinic accepted its first clients in 2008, more than 140 law students, working under managing attorneys, have assisted hundreds of veterans with disability claims.

The clinic works with Virginia Commonwealth University’s Center for Psychological Services and Development, which provides counseling, assessment and referrals to the veterans.

In August, W&M’s Puller Clinic became the first law school clinic to be invited to join the Department of Veterans Affairs’ Fully Developed Claims Community of Practice.

Puller Clinic directors and staff will share best practices with schools that plan similar initiatives.

Since the Puller Clinic accepted its first clients in 2008, more than 140 law students, working under managing attorneys, have assisted hundreds of veterans with disability claims.

The clinic works with Virginia Commonwealth University’s Center for Psychological Services and Development, which provides counseling, assessment and referrals to the veterans.

In August, W&M’s Puller Clinic became the first law school clinic to be invited to join the Department of Veterans Affairs’ Fully Developed Claims Community of Practice.

Puller Clinic directors and staff will share best practices with schools that plan similar initiatives.

Since the Puller Clinic accepted its first clients in 2008, more than 140 law students, working under managing attorneys, have assisted hundreds of veterans with disability claims.

The clinic works with Virginia Commonwealth University’s Center for Psychological Services and Development, which provides counseling, assessment and referrals to the veterans.

In August, W&M’s Puller Clinic became the first law school clinic to be invited to join the Department of Veterans Affairs’ Fully Developed Claims Community of Practice.

Puller Clinic directors and staff will share best practices with schools that plan similar initiatives.

Since the Puller Clinic accepted its first clients in 2008, more than 140 law students, working under managing attorneys, have assisted hundreds of veterans with disability claims.

The clinic works with Virginia Commonwealth University’s Center for Psychological Services and Development, which provides counseling, assessment and referrals to the veterans.

In August, W&M’s Puller Clinic became the first law school clinic to be invited to join the Department of Veterans Affairs’ Fully Developed Claims Community of Practice.

Puller Clinic directors and staff will share best practices with schools that plan similar initiatives.

Since the Puller Clinic accepted its first clients in 2008, more than 140 law students, working under managing attorneys, have assisted hundreds of veterans with disability claims.

The clinic works with Virginia Commonwealth University’s Center for Psychological Services and Development, which provides counseling, assessment and referrals to the veterans.

In August, W&M’s Puller Clinic became the first law school clinic to be invited to join the Department of Veterans Affairs’ Fully Developed Claims Community of Practice.

Puller Clinic directors and staff will share best practices with schools that plan similar initiatives.

Since the Puller Clinic accepted its first clients in 2008, more than 140 law students, working under managing attorneys, have assisted hundreds of veterans with disability claims.

The clinic works with Virginia Commonwealth University’s Center for Psychological Services and Development, which provides counseling, assessment and referrals to the veterans.

In August, W&M’s Puller Clinic became the first law school clinic to be invited to join the Department of Veterans Affairs’ Fully Developed Claims Community of Practice.

Puller Clinic directors and staff will share best practices with schools that plan similar initiatives.

Since the Puller Clinic accepted its first clients in 2008, more than 140 law students, working under managing attorneys, have assisted hundreds of veterans with disability claims.

The clinic works with Virginia Commonwealth University’s Center for Psychological Services and Development, which provides counseling, assessment and referrals to the veterans.
W&M law school sets conference on veterans - Richmond Tim...